DRIVING TOUR OF HISTORICAL SITES IN INGHAM COUNTY

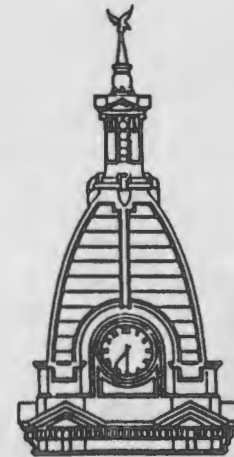

INTRODUCTION

This booklet includes all properties that have been listed by the National, State and County Register of Historic Places in the County of Ingham. Also listed are the Michigan Centennial Farms, Centennial Businesses and the only tree in the State of Michigan that has attained Bicentennial Landmark status.

This booklet is a record of the sites and structures that are important in the history of Ingham County and its development.

Sites listed may be evaluated and determined eligible by different qualifications from the National, State and County levels.

Sites are listed alphabetically and sometimes listed in more than one register. This tour guide to historical sites in the County of Ingham is put out by the Ingham County Commission on History in hopes the past can be preserved for future generations.

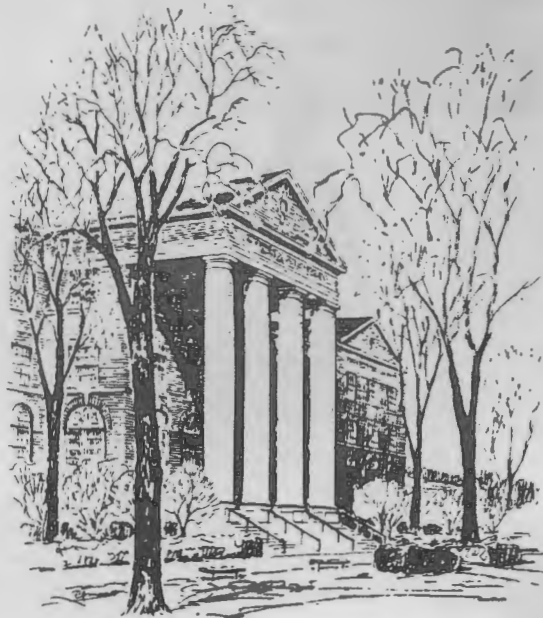

The Ingham County Commission on History is the oldest Commission on History in the State of Michigan.

School just won't die

Many transformations save it for history

By CAROL HASKIN
Staff Writer

From house to schoolhouse to warehouse to architectural offices, the Cherry Street School has had a long and varied history.

This week the building is being honored by the Ingham County Historical Commission with the erection of a historical plaque.

The ex-school is the first building the commission has honored for successful renovation — a tribute to the architectural firm of Manson, Jackson, Kane, Inc., who undertook the renovation project and moved into the building in 1988.

"MANSON, JACKSON and Kane have taken this building and with very little change on the outside have transformed an old warehouse into a very workable building," said Ingham County Historian Ford Ceasar, explaining the award.

The building was slated to be demolished to make room for a parking lot when the firm rescued it. They replaced the plumbing and heating, moved the central staircase to the outside of the building, then redecorated the interior in a modern design.

The building stands on a site originally occupied by a home which, beginning in 1873, was used as an overflow unit for the overcrowded Lansing schools.

In 1883, the school system bought the property and in 1894 the district sold the original house for $75 then, for $6,880, built the front portion of the structure now on the site. The building housed eight grades.

BY 1915, the city population had grown so much that a $6,000 addition was necessary.

"The building had its ups and downs in later years," Ceasar said. "It was probably discontinued as a school facility around the time of the Great Depression. Then it was used as a plumbing and electrical supply warehouse by the school district."

Elmer Manson, senior partner of Manson, Jackson, Kane, Inc., which renovated and altered numerous churches, schools and institutional buildings, said renovation of the school to suit the firm took about five months.

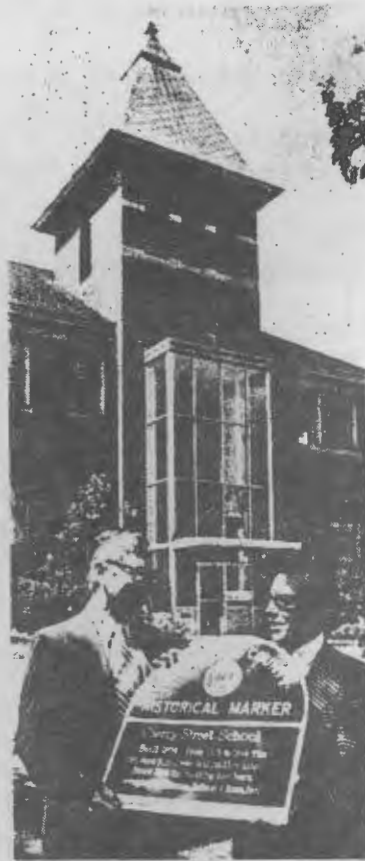

MANSON SAID his firm chose to renovate rather than build an entirely new structure because it was economically feasible.

"Renovation is an opportunity for people looking for office space to achieve more spacious offices at a minimal cost," Manson said.

Manson believes there is a place for both traditional and contemporary architecture in modern cities.

"THERE IS no question of the compatibility of traditional architecture and more contemporary structures," he said. "If anything, it's a question of scale. New buildings can respect old structures."

While the firm has done little to change the exterior of the Cherry Street School, the interior has been completely transformed to feature sleek modern lines, bright tones and bold contemporary art.

"Our interior expresses the image we like to project to our clients," Manson said, "that of competence and more modern architectural concepts fitted into a traditional shell."

THE CHERRY Street School is surrounded by a residential district boasting homes that also date back to the turn of the century.

A Lansing Historical Commission study carried out in 1971-72 proposed the area as a historic district, saying that steps should be taken to preserve and renovate the historic buildings.

According to Ceasar, owners of these homes can get partial funding for renovation projects such as painting by contacting city hall.
